

No More Mr. “Nice” IRS

Remember a couple of years ago when the IRS was investigated for harassing people and being overzealous in collecting past due taxes. That is when the IRS came out with their new public relations campaign to win over the American public, where they renamed themselves, the “new, kinder & gentler” IRS. I am here to tell you that those days are over.

The IRS recently conducted a study and determined that taxpayers are grossly underpaying their taxes. They determined that the difference between what taxpayers SHOULD pay in tax and what they DO pay in tax is approximately $345 billion. With the huge budget deficits facing the government, Congress is very happy to collect this unpaid tax.

In the IRS investigation, they were able to determine who the largest offenders were, and they are:

- Self employed individuals with inflated write offs
- Partnerships or S-corporation owners who fail to report all income
- Tipped employees underreporting actual earnings
- Gamblers who do not report all of their winnings

Now you might ask, what is the IRS going to do about all of this? Well, the IRS is going to increase the number of audits being conducted. Congress has increased the audit budget by $326 million in order to recover this unpaid tax.

Tax laws change frequently and the tax code is currently more than 67,500 pages long. Filing taxes correctly while minimizing your taxes can be a difficult task to handle, and that is why it is always recommended that you work with a professional CPA when filing your taxes.
